THE CHALLENGE OF THE JOBLESS

Excerpts from address on Unemployment by Rabbi Maurice M. Eisendrath from the pulpit of Holy Blossom Synagogue, Toronto.

Appalling indeed is the horrible plight of the unnumbered hosts of men who are everywhere swelling the ever growing ranks of the unemployed in this wealthiest of all worlds, amid a proud and pampered, fattened and overfed generation that blithely goes its selfish way, playing its happy games of golf and cards, blandly fiddling before burning Rome, oblivious to the suffering which is everywhere to be found — a suffering more keen and poignant than man has perhaps ever known before. The United States, symbol of progress and efficiency, undoubtedly the wealthiest and most powerful nation that man has ever seen, leads the march of the unemployed with from three to five, some say even six million out of work. Here is a people with the largest national income, with the most valuable material resources and treasures, a people boasting of two hundred odd individuals who count their annual income, not their fortunes, but their incomes, in from one to fifty million dollars a year—and perhaps six million starving souls stalking the streets, pleading for a chance to labor at tasks most menial and degrading, tramping the streets hour after hour, arising before dawn, hurrying to employment agencies, maddened by the fear that their dearest friend might precede them there, reduced thus to primitive estate, to veritable beasts fighting for a bone, searching, searching for a job which is everywhere denied, jammed into bread lines, snivellingly to thank an 'indulgent' society for casting its crumbs from the banquet table — such is the scene which can be observed upon the streets of almost every city in this wealthiest nation in the world today. And with the exception of France, now reaping the reward for its bleeding some fifteen years ago, the picture is the same in every other land—Germany with over two and a half million; Britain not far behind; Italy, and even far away Japan, reaching likewise close to the million mark. Behold, perhaps twenty millions of men in all — more than twice as many souls as there are men, women and children in the whole of Canada — denied even the God-given right to exist. Poor stricken souls driven with each succeeding day nearer to distraction and destitution, beholding their paltry savings which they have scrimped and sacrificed to store up, swiftly consumed by pressing needs. Small wonder then that our asylums are being overrun with the insane, our prisons overcrowded, that crime is on a rampage and communism threatens to destroy our civilization.

But what shall we do more than we have already done? We protest, as we look very wise and wring our hands with simulated pain. Did not we in Canada call a special session of Parliament for the express purpose of curing unemployment? Did we not magnanimously bestow of our bounty twenty million dollars to provide work for the unemployed? Shame on those ungrateful folk who maintain that one-tenth of the amount we spend annually on armaments and soldiers' pay rolls and military pensions and war debts is not enough to care for the destitute and hungry! And besides, did we not exact a wonder working protective tariff? Behold the masses streaming into the factories and mills. "Prosperity is just around the corner; happy days are here again." Surely we are not so shortsighted and myopic of vision that we cannot look just across the border to behold the ultimate and dismal failure of protection there. Relief for some few may be found with Mr.

THE UNITY OF REACTION

One interesting by-product of the present Zionist situation is the demonstration of a capacity for unified reaction on the part of the scattered sections of Jewdom throughout the world.

Of late it has become increasingly difficult for the critical observer to place his finger on the thread that holds together the concept of a unitized Jewish people. Preachers and rhetoricians are in the habit of speaking of the "Jew" or "Israel" as an entity. If they were to be pressed for a definition of the unitive factors in Jewish life, they would be hard put to it to explain just what they have in mind. They talk glibly of the Jewish religion or the Torah as the force that makes all Jews kin. But they could not deny the fact that viewed as a manner of living, the Judaism of a Rabbi Isserman or a Rabbi Foster has more in common with the Christianity of a Dr. Holmes or a Dr. Fosdick than it has with the "Yiddishkeit" of the Hofetz Hayim or even of Rabbi Gordon of Toronto. The phrases of "Jewish consciousness" and "race consciousness" have been considerably bandied about as magical formulas that are to account for the belief in the solidarity of the disparate Jewries of the world. The realist, however, could not help feeling that these phrases are mere abstractions that do not correspond to any actual objects or states. Of course, the new faith of Zionism is supposed to have the power to bring together adherents from different parts of the globe into a fraternity of service. But it is quite clear that insofar as Zionism has failed to integrate itself into the mental manners and psychological attitudes of its professors, it does not exert any determining, harmonizing influence on their processes of living. The Jew in Oshkosh, or Charleston who contributes to the Keren Hayesod because he is naturally social and wants to "belong" or the Jew in Harlem who is a member of a Zionist organization because he has political aspirations, is temperamentally incapable of appreciating the motive of the God-seeking dreamer of Minsk or Warsaw. The Zionism of the former is as different from the Zionism of the latter as the social, economic and environmental conditions of the two types differ. Without going into any further details or elaborations, we may safely say that Jewish life with its tremendously great variety of types and interests and attitudes taxed one's ingenuity in seeking to discover the essence of its unity.

Now, came the Passfield "White Paper." It deals with the rights of the Jewish people in Palestine. The rights assailed are referable to the scheme of establishing a Jewish national entity in Palestine. Ordinarily the question of the nationalist pretensions in Jewish life are the subject of serious differences of opinion. The experiment in Palestine insofar as it aimed to crystallize the nationalist interpretation of Jewish history and life, has been viewed with marked disfavor by a large section of the Jewish people. The Agency may have had some effect in formally reconciling certain individuals to the ideals of Zionism. It would not however, have gone so far as to revolutionize the attitudes of the different groups whose whole philosophy of life rotated on an anti-nationalist axis. Jewish life still presented a spectacle of confusion and conflicts of tendencies. But unorganized as the Jewish scene may have been, the assault of the Labor Government on Jewish rights evoked a reaction of amazing unanimity. Instantly the scattered fragments of the Jewish people in the different

HOUDE EXPLAINS SPEECH ON JEWS

Senator Camillien Houde, Leader of the Opposition made the following statement, concerning a certain declaration attributed to him, in his recent speech, on the Jewish question:

"I have nothing to retract from what I have said at Quebec, concerning the Jews, but a report made on this point of my speech by a Montreal morning paper, obliges me to explain what happened at a certain moment, while I was speaking on the question. Somebody in the audience said 'If the Jews are not satisfied, let them leave the country.' I answered that if they wished to gratify him on this point, they had now a country where to go: Palestine.

"All the papers, except the aforementioned, reported me in this. I have nothing else to say for the moment."

SUCCESS OR FAILURE?

The Federation of Jewish Philanthropies inaugurates its annual appeal this Sunday. Frankly speaking, business depression, accompanied as it is by a psychology of defeat, offers a poor background for campaign enthusiasm.

However — there is no chance in selecting the time of a campaign in behalf of the poor and unfortunate. Present human needs in Montreal cannot await "an opportune moment for giving." No Jew, therefore, who can give, dares refuse to do his part in this year's appeal.

And let it be remembered "that this thing of giving" under clouds of depression is not something new in Jewish life. Far from it! Our sires persecuted, beaten and poverty-stricken, ever shared whatever they had with the less fortunate. Persecuted thru'out the middle ages, our fathers gave! Huddled together in abject misery in European Ghettos —they gave! There was only one Jew who didn't give, and that was the poorest Jew in the community—for he had no one to whom to give.

Let us face the facts! Our fathers were not dressed in satins; they didn't have limousines; they didn't play golf and plan Mediterranean tours. They didn't even have Federation Banquets and Federation Drives. No! They even did not have "non-Jewish spokesmen" come to stir their hearts — But our fathers gave — gave most generously!

What will Montreal Jewry do during the next week? Will it succeed or fail? Will our men of means stick to their money like leeches and bring shame upon the name Jew? In the words of Disraeli — "We can do anything but fail!"

BECAUSE I AM A JEW!

"Because I am a Jew — I cannot obtain a position there!" Thus spoke a youth of good character and splendid appearance. "No! In this big department store they only employ Christians."

What a shame that one's religious creed should prove to be an obstacle toward the obtaining of employment! But the shame rests upon so-called Christians who claim to be adherents of a religion of love, and who, in reality, practice hate.

"Because I am a Jew!" How often have Jewish youths been forced to deny their Jewish identity in order to obtain work. Of course such an act is that of moral cowardice. But all of this is brought on by the Christlessness of Christians.

Glory to the young man who will walk the streets jobless rather than to belie his glorious heritage.

Some day — the religion of understanding and kindliness will rule the earth. Then human beings will help one another to pilgrimage this earth because they are brethren. Then labels such as Jew or Christian, Caucasian or Hottentot will be meaningless. What boots it what we are, so long as we love God and our fellowmen!

THE CLOSED MIND

Progress is impeded by obstacles such as disease and poverty. But one of the greatest of drawbacks to human advancement is "the closed mind" — the mind which refuses to welcome new truths — which is antagonistic to new ways and methods of life. Such a mind has ever been a menace to civilization. Such a mind has ever been the cause for the persecutions of scientists and truth-seekers.

The problems facing the human race to-day are paramount — they are problems pertaining to social relationships. Somehow nations and peoples do not know how to live together. Despite the mechanical inventions which have made of the world a "little city" — racial antagonisms abide. Rivalry among nations hold sway. We need new ideas, new methods of living. Bold minds are needed — open minds that will unite in building a new world beautiful.

Bennett's tariff scheme but a cure for unemployment lies elsewhere, we are sure. Protective tariffs are quite all right if Canada wishes selfishly and recklessly to go on a temporary prosperity spree but the inevitable headache is sure to follow.

Some there are who, beholding the relentless march of the machine, beholding the great harvesters and looms, the pounding hammers and whirling drills, driving men to distraction and die need; some there are who despondently and despairingly plead with us to smash the machine, to throw off its [illegible] to bow at its onward march.

Understanding and sympathetic though we must be toward this altogether natural reaction on the part of the dispossessed, we cannot however agree. Nothing more hopeless dreamed up the belief that unemployment is [illegible] and the machine. Yet, everywhere is heard the plaint — conservation, conservation. How judicious, how statesmanlike! How urgent. Conservation of our Canadian wheat [illegible]. And millions starving in China, in India. And we need not go so far afield, for there are many starving within the boundaries of our [illegible]. Conservation, forsooth. What a despicable and [illegible] plea. How dare we speak of conservation so long as there is [illegible] one man, woman, or child who has no work and is plagued and harried by the ever-increasing burden of economic dread. No conservation, but wanton waste — that is the cry of our day, and the reason for our distress. The products of the machine are not distributed commensurate with the power of the latter to produce. [illegible] for people to be free — but economic freedom [illegible] and although for a time we shall grow richer in our pleasures, we shall not have as much. If two persons of the people of the United States, for example, control sixty percent of the [illegible] and if the multitudes own five percent of them, [illegible] of prosperity [illegible] of the national income, with [illegible] through stock gambling, and [illegible] growing from [illegible] — then [illegible] our present economic plight. We have grown [illegible] of necessity increased the purchasing power of the great multitudes of men the world over. [illegible] We are producing no more than the market can consume, but there are millions [illegible] who can buy.

[illegible] who closes up shop or reduces the wages of his employees is committing economic suicide. But many [illegible] the greatest [illegible] the slaughter-house policy of [illegible] how much is dictated of moral necessity is such a struggle. [illegible] the employer has [illegible] the most precious [illegible] of life — [illegible] and pleasure. [illegible] he has [illegible] up sufficient surplus to [illegible] over these periods of depression without so much as [illegible] a single [illegible] and [illegible] a profit against [illegible] when business is slow, the first step he takes is to discharge his [illegible] servants of course there is a [illegible] value [illegible] for the [illegible] of [illegible]. Labor is as much entitled to the surplus [illegible] as the [illegible] squanders it [illegible] of plenty is [illegible], and to who has not provided such a fund on the part of his employees it [illegible] is not only a poor business man but a moral [illegible] as well. Society is the inescapable corollary of no less a wise economist and [illegible] than Christ [illegible] who wrote: "The right to the [illegible] of employment's premium with the right to regularity in the payment of [illegible] the interest on bonds and investments. No dividends should ever be paid until each of these fixed charges has been met. A reserve to insure the regularity of employment is as important as the reserve for depreciation of property and plant, and it is equally a part of the fixed charges to make the annual contribution to that reserve. No business is actually [illegible] which cannot do so." Upon such a just and moral basis how many of our businesses of today are founded, it is very truth. The masses are suffering today because business men everywhere, in their greed and selfishness, in their craving to provide for themselves more, have failed to meet their [illegible] responsibilities, and unemployment will increase and human want will grow but so long as we continue our present and heartless [illegible] of the unemployed and [illegible].

But we must not [illegible] private enterprise alone to provide such much needed [illegible] from which [illegible] grow in abundance. It is [illegible] of economists that at the snail like rate such projects at [illegible] are being undertaken, it would take over a thousand years to [illegible] in the United States alone would be [illegible]. And we [illegible] radicals and impatient idealists are [illegible] for the great [illegible] who [illegible] but only. There is but one way temporarily at least, and until [illegible] to [illegible] the purchasing power of the poor and to re-remedy the pressure of the unemployed, — and that is by enacting as speedily as possible a comprehensive and adequate system of state unemployment insurance.

Almost every nation has today adopted some unemployment insurance plan. Some are better than others; none is sufficient; but all are striving toward the proper goal. Wherefore, then, is Canada without any such scheme at all? Surely we cannot afford to trifle with the two hundred odd thousand who are idle in our midst nor to fail to find some better solution to their need than mere protective tariffs and public works.

But we must not think that even this is a panacea to the problem; it is not the Messiah nor will Utopia dawn as soon as this be granted. Not until some order be brought out of the chaos and anarchy of our present competitive profit system, not until to the toiler will accrue the full fruit of his arduous tasks, not until righteousness reign and true brotherhood be supreme, not until then will our problem be solved, and this flagrant wrong be righted.

It is high time then that we were on our way. It is high time that we ceased mouthing such fine sounding sentiments and actually attacked this most pressing problem of today. When a catastrophe occurs, when the majestic R-101 crashes in the night and a handful of lives is consumed in flames, an entire world bows its head and mourns. Experts are despatched to the site of the tragedy and months are devoted to the unravelling of its cause. But when millions the world over are dying for want of bread, and poignant pangs of hunger ravage the multitudes, when we ourselves are dooming innocent children to whom we certainly can ascribe no sinfulness, no sloth or dissipation as the reason for their poverty — when we are dooming innocent children and even generations yet unborn to physical maladies, mental distortions and untimely deaths, we stand helplessly by, ignore the scientific writings of our economists and follow our superficial and opportunistic politicians to destruction. Yes, we regard human life as so sacred that we look upon murder as the most heinous crime worthy of death itself — and yet, — we permit people to come into this world and then deprive them of the very means of livelihood. Ah, what a maddened, cross purpose world it really is!

On Armistice Day we stood in silence before the Cenotaph dedicated to "our glorious dead." There we pledged ourselves always and ever to remember their deeds of valour and self sacrifice. And it is right and proper that we should. Frequently we were urged to keep our minds fixed on this splendid past. It is so much safer to dwell in memory. But what about the present? What about the myriads we saw gathered around that memorial search their shivering, hungry, cold, wistful souls during the solemn service in which the name of Christ was mentioned no less than twenty times, for that service to beg for a nickel or a dime to buy a bowl of soup? What about remembering the living for a change? What about spending a little less for fine uniforms and guns and powder and [illegible]? Yes, what about spending a little less on those splendid homes [illegible] and a little more on living men and [illegible], whether [illegible] maimed, shattered and scarred? To do otherwise is to be false to [illegible] ideals common to us all, to spend ourselves and world annihilate [illegible] to be impractical from a purely monetary point of view, and [illegible] betray our most sacred trust, — and to be judged guilty of as [illegible] as [illegible] injustice and as great an oppression as can be charged against [illegible] the [illegible] autocratic and tyrannical rulers of the past.

JEWISH PAINTER EXHIBITING WORKS

Abraham Manievich is holding an exhibition of oils at 1347 St. Catherine Street West. There are thirty canvases. Abraham Manievich was born in Russia, where he began his career as an artist. A government grant enabled him to study at the Munich Academy. He has held "one man" exhibitions at many galleries throughout Europe.

Manievich came to this continent a few years ago. His last independent exhibition was held in New York at the Durant Ruel Galleries. Recently coming to Canada on a painting expedition, Manievich decided to hold an exhibition here, and this is the first time his paintings have been shown publicly in this country.

CITY EXECUTIVE RECEIVES JEWISH DELEGATES

In reply to a delegation of the Hebrew Consumptive Aid Association which on November 12, interviewed the municipal representatives in reference to a plot of land for the erection of an Incurable Home, The City Executive is studying a list of vacant lots owned by the city with a view to granting the request. The delegation was introduced by Alderman J. Shubert and Alderman M. Seigler and consisted of M. Scherer, A. Potechin, D. Mallek, Mrs. V. J. Klein and Mrs. M. Schacter.

LADIES BIKUR CHOILIM SOCIETY

Mrs. J. Wiesenfeld was hostess at the board meeting of Ladies' Bikur Choilim Society at the Balfour Cafeteria, Monday, November 10. Mrs. M. Lefcort presided. Mrs. P. Kooperstock spoke of the sick and needy she had visited. Miss Sybil Serchuk donated a hand embroidered apron and a novelty which was won by Mrs. J. Weinstein. $9.35 was realized.

EARLY SOLUTION OF SCHOOL QUESTION

An early solution of the Jewish School question was forecast by Premier Taschereau at the Government offices Tuesday morning, November 18 and by J. A. Matthewson, President of the Protestant School Board, and Samuel W. Livingston, President of the Jewish School Commission created at the last session of the Quebec Legislature.

What the terms of the agreement between the Protestant and Jewish commissions are was not disclosed, but by what was said, it is concluded that the Jewish children will continue to attend the schools of the Protestant School Board, and that the legislation passed by the Provincial Legislature to bring about an understanding would be abrogated at the next session, or left indefinitely in abeyance.

Mr. Matthewson said:

"But let me say that I regret that certain public men and politicians have thought fit to make of the sacred question of education a kind of 'political football,' thus endangering in a certain measure the happy solution of the problem. All we ask, is that the question be left out of politics, and if this can be obtained, it will help our negotiations materially." M. Livingston endorsed Mr. Matthewson's statement.

PAPER PRAISES VICTORIA JEW

From the Colonist, Victoria, B.C.

"Fred Landsberg suffered many tribulations and privations in a country which was not so highly favored as Canada, and those experiences have softened his heart and made him exceedingly sympathetic with all afflicted and unfortunate persons. In fact, Mr. Landsberg is so active in the cause of all who have met with misfortune that he appears to have given up all attention to his own business and is devoting all his time and energy to the business of others. How he manages to do that we do not know, and besides, it is none of our business.

Any man who is so busy and so disinterested we should obviously be delighted to meet; but we do not like to meet Mr. Landsberg. As a matter of fact, we make it our business to dodge him whenever we can within the limits of our waning physical capacity. We duck and dodge, then, whenever we see the well-known philanthropist on the streets; not because he is a bore, and therefore to be avoided like a plague, but because he is always engaged in the prosecution of some worthy cause and will be almost sure to ask us to do something on behalf of that cause.

We usually manage to keep out of the path of that good and worthy man, but he caught us coming around the corner the other morning, seized us and held on. From his pocket he produced a number of letters portraying pitiful cases of suffering and privation amongst wives and children of victims of the war which would have moved the heart of the most callous and hardened person. This is Red Cross and Armistice Period Week, when funds are being collected which will be devoted entirely for the relief of returned men many of whose disabilities did not develop until long after they had been discharged from the army—and their dependent wives and children.

"We said then, as we have indicated before, that we were loth to make our special department of The Colonist a begging department. Most people regard with repugnance continuous appeals to their generosity and persistent assaults upon their purses. But the Red Cross and Armistice Period appeal is quite different from ordinary requests and tag days. There is no doubt that actual suffering and privation exists, and that something must be done to relieve cases which cannot be relieved through the agency of the Government Pension Board. That is why we have yielded to the spell of Mr. Landsberg's persuasive eloquence and the deeper appeal of the contents of the letters he compelled us to read and have devoted so much space to the cause of the disabled returned men and their dependents.

If any of our readers are as sceptical as we are naturally inclined to be, we trust Mr. Landsberg may pounce upon them, too, and compel them to read some of the letters containing really pathetic appeals of the wives of veterans to their generosity."

Labor Government Claims New Palestine Land Scheme Under Consideration

In London, November 17, admission that the British mandate in Palestine was seriously attacked in the House of Commons by Right Hon. David Lloyd George, Liberal leader, and so vigorously defended by the Labour government

At the conclusion of the debate between the Jewish Premier and Lloyd George, Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Premier Ramsay MacDonald reaffirmed the government's intention to carry out the mandate in full.

Mr. Lloyd George contended that the only way to prevent more trouble was to have a complete new policy and start afresh. He stressed the White Paper has been [illegible] as a breach of the obligations of the mandate and declared in the House of Commons that the Jewish people would work the mandate [illegible] Jewish people in Palestine.

During the course of the Premier's address he stated that the Jew was not going to be dispossessed of the land he had bought and developed in Palestine.

Mr. Shiels, replying for the Government, insisted the mandate would be carried out and disclosed a new Government development scheme by which it is proposed to settle approximately 10,000 families on the land at an expenditure of £12,500,000. The scheme would be supported by the Government assisted by a loan.

He contended there was an Arab as well as a Jewish viewpoint and that the former had not been neglected by Parliament as much as the Jewish.

He said that, however excellent were the intentions of the promoters of the mandate its fundamentals were questions to be decided.

The mandate's existence has been a source of irritation since the beginning, he said. The Jews held the view that its main purpose was the establishment of a Jewish national home, everything else being secondary or complementary, while a small but vigorous section of the mandate's opposition, as well as the Arabs, held that the development of self-governing institutions should be the leading consideration of the mandate.

Going into details of the Government's new land project he said the Government intends in the first place to provide for the landless Arabs who he said, have been dispossessed as a result of the land's passing to the Jews. The balance, he said, would be available for the settlement of both Arabs and Jews.

He denied that the White Paper meant to say that as long as Arabs were unemployed Jews should not be admitted. The immigration regulations, he said, will be carried out with commonsense as the Government fully recognizes that a great flow of Jewish capital is brought into Palestine with a view of providing employment for Jews and otherwise would not have been invested at all.

Mr. MacDonald did not make a detailed speech but declared he stood by every word Shiels had uttered.

Sir Herbert Samuel, prominent Liberal, said he doubted whether the speeches would go far to reassure those who had thought it their duty to criticize the White Paper. He said he approved, however, of the White Paper's proposal to set up a legislative council in Palestine.

COMFORTS

Most undesirable things have at least one or two points in their favor. The comfort, or pacifier, has not one redeeming feature which may be put forward to balance the many bad and undesirable qualities which it possesses.

To begin with, it does not even do what its name pretends. It does not comfort or pacify the baby. Crying is stopped for a time, because the baby always stops crying when he sees what he wants, and he does want his comfort if he has been used to having one.

Some parents may think that because the baby cries for the comfort, it should be given to him, as he apparently knows what he wants. But do they give him everything he cries and requires for, or do they discriminate in what they give him because they know more than the baby does about what is good for him?

The constant sucking of the comfort makes the child irritable and tends to upset him. It quiets him for a few minutes, because he gets what he wants, but after that it only irritates him.

A serious result of the use of the comfort is the deformity of the mouth that results if the habit is continued. The bones of the baby's body are comparatively soft and rather easily moulded. The continued sucking of the comfort forces the bones around the mouth into an abnormal shape. Projecting teeth are among the mouth deformities that follow.

The most serious conditions that result from the use of the comfort are due to the introduction of disease germs into the mouth of the child. It is impossible to keep a comfort clean. To do so would mean that it should be boiled every time it is used, just as the feeding bottles and nipples are boiled after they are used. The comfort is moist, and as it hangs from the child's neck it comes into contact with many articles; the result is that it is soiled by the many things which it touches.

The use of the comfort is simply a bad habit which may do the child permanent harm by deforming the mouth, and one which is, no doubt, a real factor in the spread of disease.

There is no reason why a baby should be constantly sucking a something. The comfort does not help to keep the baby healthy. If the child is irritable, there is something wrong which should be properly dealt with and most certainly the proper way to relieve him is not by sticking something into his mouth.

Not so many years ago, every baby was rocked in a cradle and put into long clothes that prevented him from kicking out his legs and having the exercise he needed. The rocking cradle and the long clothes have passed into disuse, and the sooner the comfort goes the same way the better it will be for the baby.

Questions concerning Health addressed to the Canadian Medical Association, 184 College Street, Toronto, will be answered personally by letter.

The Enemy's Gates

By Richmond Barrett

By Special Arrangement with Boni and Liveright

"Let's not talk about that," Morton advised. Turning away from the bed, he crossed the room, raised the shade and looked out, with unseeing absorption, into the quadrangle.

"There's no sense in our going on this way, you know—that's obvious." His back to George, he spoke with a judical niceness, appeared to be summing up some former friendly discussion. He had rehearsed this scene for weeks; now he confidently expected that it would move with the precision of the last act in a correct drawing-room drama. "We've done our best, both of us. We owe it to ourselves now to try some new arrangement." He had begun to tap the windowpane. "A man has to consider his self-respect and all that. I've decided I can't put up with it, George,—your spending your nights out with a girl. You're not so easy to live with, even when you behave; and of course I realize I'm fussy." The clink of his fingernails on the glass continued; like a clever bit of stage business, it chimed in with the metallic coldness of his voice. "But if it hadn't been for Molly Banks, I wouldn't have thought of making a change."

In a sudden strange dread, he broke off. The charged tension of the stillness behind him had all at once unnerved him.

Then, hearing the thud of bare heels on the floor, he had got his last stark words out at a distracted haste. "I've told Alec I'd room with him — next year."

George, springing up out of the bed, had taken two long lopes and grabbed him by the shirt-collar. Morton, twirled about, crashed against the bureau. "You sneak!" George yelled. "I'm your brother—and you're ashamed of me — that's the trouble with you. You'd throw your whole family over to get on. A lot you'd care—if one of your damned friends slept with Molly."

Morton, lifted half off his feet by the grip of George's thin fingers, stuttered from his tightening throat, "Let go of me, will you? Let—let go!"

Incalculable forces had somehow been loosed and, booming into the hollow air-tight shell of his pretty play, had blown it to fragments. His logical pretexts, the list of unanswerable excuses he had drawn up in his own defense, had been roared down in the explosion.

George was no longer the sheepish boy. He had dilated into a figure of primitive justice. His face, with its jutting jaw, was thrust close to Morton's; in his eyes was the blinded malevolence of a Cain.

"George—I didn't realize—I didn't think you'd take it so hard," Morton panted. "It's not too late—I'll room with you."

"I'd cut my throat—after this—before I'd live with you." George's breath came thick and rough as sobbing. "Now get out."

Morton, to his dazed relief, had been flung aside. Under the momentum of the savage shove, he stumbled into a chair and cut his knee.

"George, I'm sorry. Forget about it, won't you?" he begged, nursing his hurt leg. For all his coolness of calculation, he had been refusing to scratch the smooth surface of his motives. It was George who had broken through to the very heart of his secret and struck into the hard bed-rock of his ambition. The iron sound still rang and hammered accusingly in his ears. For the moment he was ashamed of himself, and longed to crawl back inside the old family lines.

"Get out of my room, God damn you," George thundered.

Morton obeyed precipitately. Out in the tidy bright study again, he straightened up and drew in a long breath. Well, it was over anyhow. It hadn't turned out quite as he had expected; but he had come through all right. His craven terror had subsided by now. He was free—that, really, was the main point—he was free!

George's door slammed. A thin rain of plaster, dislodged from the ceiling by the terrific concussion, settled on Morton's shoulders and neat head. Carefully, daintily, he brushed himself off.

Less than a year later, George had been pleading with Morton to stay "five minutes longer." His loneliness had weakened his endurance; his unwilling dependence on his brother had grown since their separation. Though he kept away stubbornly from Morton's rooms, he looked forward with pathetic eagerness to the casual calls he received in his own cheerless quarters.

"Queer——mighty queer!" he confided to the glaring emptiness of his room as he set to work copying the little essay on Botticelli.

CHAPTER VII

Into George's windows had drifted all day the sulky grumbles of a city under the oppression of the first hot weather. The warmth was so dense and sodden that all the street noises had melted into one drunken rumor, had grown saturated with the sluggish stickiness of the air. George had been studying for to-morrow's final examination in Nineteenth Century Poets. In the morning he had been given a rigorous drill by Morton in possible "spot" passages. Since lunch, he had been muddling his brain with disorganized attacks on "Prometheus Unbound" and "Christabel" and "Pauline." At last, drooping over the ponderous volume of Browning in his damp hands, he had drowsed off.

All at once he had thrilled awake. It was still stagnantly close, but the blaze of the sun had gone out. He stretched and let his book fall with a crash to the floor. The blood seemed to have thinned and quickened in his veins. All day he had the sensation of wriggling helplessly on a spit before a fire; now, for the first time since he had stumbled out of bed, he felt free and alert. Everywhere humanity was reviving in the drenched gloom of the twilight. Across Vanderbilt Court somebody was strumming on a piano. From the Green came the clear shrill note of a mans whistle—refreshing as a breese from off the water. The fact that the night threatened to be clammy and steaming hot did not matter at present; at least it would be dark and perhaps a sudden shower would wash clean the clogged pores of the world. The heat that had been baked into bodies and pavements during the day was expanding, diffusing itself in a tepid moisture; the fever had broken to a soaking sweat. A spirit of restlessness and unnatural stimulation was abroad. The populace of New Haven was making ready for a barbaric festival of recovery. Crowds scrambled aboard the Chapel Street trolley-cars. In every dormitory, the students stood under the icy trickle of the shower-baths, pounded their chests and flanks lustily, sang out their glee and forgot all about to-morrow's sun, to-morrow's tests. Groups of boys with newly shaved faces and clean shirts congregated in Vanderbilt Court, lingered there for a time in a half-sad reluctance to break away from the cloistral peace, then trooped off with a conscious braggadocio in quest of adventure.

George, alone in his study, had been listening wistfully to the bustle of preparation around him. He had no desire to join any of the parties that were being planned in the courtyard under his window. He never got drunk—he was both too proud and too shy for that relaxation; nor could he enter into the loud pastime of picking up girls, of jollying and jostling them on a crowded dancefloor. With his morb'd sensitiveness, his hot terror of letting down his defenses, he would have acted as a depressant on any convivial gathering. He had nothing to offer to a crowd. An exile, he had been thwarted of communication with everything but himself. If he could have relished his own absurdities coined them into the accepted currency of small-talk, he might have slipped unconsciously into a certain good-fellowship with the boys around him. An occasional sly boastfulness, in regard to his relations with Molly Banks, might have helped him, too; his stubborn refusal to brag had long ago struck the other students as an ugly sign; the general attitude towards him had therefore stiffened to a righteous disapproval. As a matter of fact, it was not gilt that made him reticent but a genuine modesty. He respected his flesh in its surrender, considered himself as sternly pledged to silence as any initiate in the rites of a religious order.

This evening he knew, although he had been reluctant to admit it to himself, that he somehow wanted to talk to a man—have a quiet dinner in the country, at an easy motoring distance; aimlessly stroll about afterwards and smoke a good cigar; come back at midnight perhaps, spend another hour smoking and at last get to bed, secure in the conviction that he'd found a decent and dependable ally—

Suddenly he heard the slam of a door, the click of heels over the concrete of the corridor, then a thunderous knocking.

He had bounded off the window-seat and was half-way across the room when a deep voice bayed out. "Bob—say, Bob!" A knob rattled. "Oh, Bob!"

George turned and plodded back to his window-seat.

In a moment, his own door had burst open, a head was thrust into the room, a hand switched on the light. Startled, George blinked at the intruder.

"Hello, Morgenthal! Have you seen Bob Thompson?"

"Oh—hello, Shipley." George nodded brusquely. "Yes——I saw him go out about half an hour ago."

"Well, why the Hell doesn't he let a man know?" Shipley, a strapping youth with the merry splayed nostrils of a Silenus, endeavored to register indignation; but good-humor and animal spirits were always working at high pressure within him. "I guess I am late," he proffered by way of excusing Thompson and forthwith exploded silently into a wide grin.

George's answering smile was a mere tentative quiver of the mouth.

"Damned hot," Shipley announced after a brief silence.

"Infernal," George agreed. He had decided he liked Shipley. He looked out of the window and tried to think of something bright to say—the sort of rocket-like remark that Morton would have sent sputtering up at such a moment: "I was hoping we'd get a breeze, when the sun went down; but we didn't," he finally brought out to his intense chagrin.

Shipley shook a courteous head. "No—we didn't," he admitted, as if grateful for a bit of information that he'd stupidly failed to track down for himself. Then, with an abrupt veer, "Going anywhere to-night, Morgenthal? Got a date?" he asked.

George, giving him a stealthy sidelong glance, sparred for time. "A date?" He repeated the question. For ten seconds he vacillated: he saw himself with Shipley wandering under the trees in the country, puffing their expensive cigars, comparing notes on life. The instinct of hero-worship, dormant since the days of Tommy Wilton's supremacy, stirred somewhere deep down in his consciousness; but his incurable suspicion still had the control. Shipley might simply have been making distracted efforts to keep the conversation alive. Even if he intended to suggest dinner and an evening together, it was only because Thompson had left him flat. George's jaw set grimly; he would not act as a makeshift substitute in any man's plans.

"Yes, I've got an engagement." On the surface, he was casual and perfunctorily polite and a trifle distant; but there was a queer draining sensation right at the pit of his stomach. Disappointment and loneliness alike affected him physically.

"Sorry." Shipley expressed his regret with proper warmth; but it was obvious that George's guarded snub had not upset his gastric juices. "Night!" He swung out of the room, raced down the stairs and pounded at a door on the lower floor; a few minutes later, he was striding across the court with an arm slung fraternally over the shoulder of another boy.

"A thimble of brandy before breakfast—the best thing in the world," proudly asserted Shipley.

"I'll try it," his companion returned with a slight quaver of dread in his voice.

They were discussing to-morrow's pick-me-ups. George gave a single sarcastic grunt. He'd never have passed muster with Shipley, he saw that now.

So it had been Molly Banks after all for him—Molly and the grind and glare of the Savin Rock amusement park.

"This is going to be my party," she told him when he called up and crossly suggested "dinner somewhere."

George, crowded into a stuffy telephone-cubicle, was not in the mood for polite acquiescence. "Who said so?" he challenged her. Fresh from a shower-bath he had started out from the dormitory with some eagerness. His skin, in its clean linen, had felt refreshed; but two minutes in the sweltering air of the pay-booth had reduced him to a wilted limpness. Sweat ran out of his pores and soaked into his underclothes; his body prickled with little nettlelike stings, as if it were encased in the poisoned shirt of Nessus. He rubbed the palm of one hand over his chafed forehead and screwed up his itching eyebrows. "Damn it, Molly, who said it was your party?" he repeated fretfully.

"Don't come, if you don't want to," she returned. "I'm going out to Savin Rock."

"Savin Rock!" he shouted. "See here, you don't expect me——"

"We won't talk about it," she cut him short. "Will you take me, George? I can go alone, you know."

"Oh, I suppose I'll take you," he surrendered and slammed up the receiver.

For weeks, Molly had shown herself pettish, restive, smolderingly vindictive. George, with his timid aversion to any publicity, had always insisted on taking her for dinner to the dullest and most decorous little tea-rooms in town. At a secluded candle-lit table, they would consume, off pretty china, the modest portions of food that establishments of the kind invariably serve. Under the haughty eyes of the proprietor—usually a widow and a dietitian, who regarded her customers as her inferiors in the social scale—George and Molly would behave with a genteel sobriety. They had soon been accepted by the women in charge and by the waitresses as an engaged couple. Fond of the gloomy infatuated George, Molly had at first been content. Unfortunately, their relation had in the end resolved itself into a drab routine. Molly, who had had too impatient a spirit to settle down to humdrum respectability, who had in fact run away from home to escape it, began to resent having the specious show of it thrust upon her. To be bored, to be lowered at and scolded by a grumpy boy—if she achieved no more than that in her New Haven career, she might just as well have stayed in Meriden. In just a year, she and George had reached the dead-level of a wrangling domesticity. Their poetic white-fire had dwindled into a guttering tallow-candle flame. They were no better than those sulky girls and youths with teething babies and mortgaged bungalows that had irritated Molly in the old days into revolt and flight.

George wasn't stingy—she granted him that; but neither was he wantonly extravagant. An energetic capable girl, Molly liked to work; she had once sworn a solemn oath that she would never marry and never loaf. She despised women who permitted themselves to be supported in a lax indolence. Ten years from now, she would in all probability have hardened into a relentlessly efficient, bad-tempered business woman. She had already a savings-account in a New Haven bank. She was not the type to wheedle money out of a man; she peremptorily demanded certain definite sums of George, but she never put forth exorbitant claims. It was not in George to be of a prodigal generosity. The gestures of a spendthrift would have made him painfully self-conscious. Without any niggardly pettiness in the matter of finances, he yet lacked the art, the histrionic gift of spending. He refused to toss coin about, because the audacious act would have attracted attention to himself. People would have regarded him with a half-fleeting tolerance and voted him a craver after notoriety. Moreover, Molly mustn't be allowed to scorn him as an easy mark. What he gave her, therefore, he gave without enthusiasm. It was a hard business transaction every time. That in itself dulled their romance. Molly profited discreetly. She had moved, last year, into an attractive apartment in a reputable, though not austere, neighborhood; and she had bought herself a substantial wardrobe of good clothes—quiet well-tailored suits, and hats that, by their assured set on her small head, proved themselves expensive.

"I've never known worse hypocrites than college boys," Molly had once informed George. "They're sneaking little prigs, most of them. You're an exception." Molly, as a clerk in a book-store, had had the opportunity and the cleverness to study students. They were usually half-abashed and half-impudent with her. She had become a figure of anomalous values in the life of New Haven. Everybody

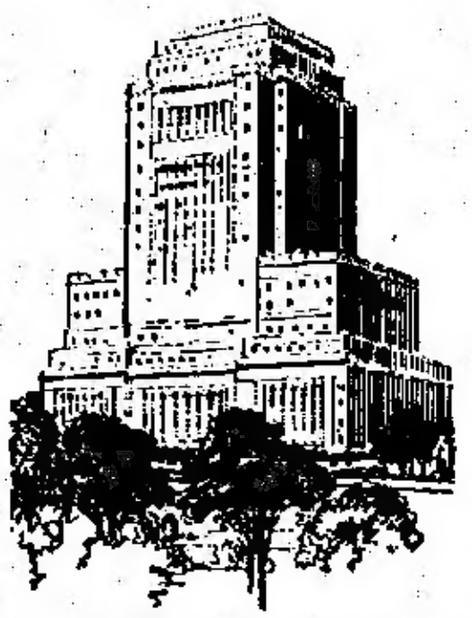
Life Assurance a form of Property



LIFE assurance is as much a form of property as a house, a farm, a bond, or a savings account with these advantages—

(1) Its present and future values are guaranteed.

(2) It constantly appreciates in value.

(3) Its values are always available in liquid form.

(4) It is property purchased on a strictly one-price-to-all basis.

When Dr. Judah L. Magnes, chancellor of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, said last year after the Arab outbreaks that the Jewish national home could be established only in co-operation with the Arabs, he was bitterly assailed. But he was supported by a chancellor who would not say a word to help him until he had reopened the 14th University year. Recently he had occasion to refer to "Zionist journalists" in the course of a speech in which he was commenting on the British White Paper. He said: "[illegible] Magnes went on to say: "It is necessary to calmly and vigorously seek a way of living together." On the basis of this, today as always, we are convinced of the friendship of the Arabs." THE LOADING RACK

THE "loading rack" at an Imperial Oil refinery is the place where refining ends and distribution begins. There gasolines and oils flow into waiting tank cars or ships for the journey that ends at one of Imperial Oil's 1,900 branch warehouses.

Before reaching the "loading rack" these gasolines and oils go through a long series of exacting processes. At every stage of manufacture they are checked—tested—re-checked—re-tested until perfection has been attained.

It is these tests that determine Imperial quality and it is this quality that has enabled modern transportation to reach its present stage of efficiency and economy. Thus have the dreams of yesterday become the realities of today. And thus, through fifty years of enterprise and leadership, has Imperial become one of the Empire's great institutions—with a fleet of ocean-going and inland water vessels—thousands of tank cars—six great refineries—oil fields on two continents—9,000 employees—a distributing system that reaches from sea to sea and from the Arctic to the International boundary.

Marvelube is Imperial's finest motor oil.

Imperial 3-Star and Imperial Ethyl are its best gasolines.

Which means that nothing finer is available.

A Great Railway

First in Enterprise
First in Size

Strong words—but true! "First in size" because Canadian National is the largest railway system in America, with over 23,000 miles of track, over 108,000 employees, a chain of magnificent hotels, steamships on two oceans, vacation resorts, hunting and fishing camps, a telegraph system, radio stations, an express service.

"First in enterprise"—because Canadian National is alive with the urge to new achievement. It has led the way in new luxury and new efficiency of equipment—first with individual radio reception on its trains first to accomplish telephone connection from a moving train first in oil-electric locomotion—first in Canada with single room sleeping cars.

When better equipment is found, the old is replaced. Not very long ago Canadian National scrapped seven solid miles of locomotives to make room for better ones. Another time it put a whole town on flat cars and built it again twenty miles away to make a better junction point. Canadian National is never finished because it is always growing.

Canadian National is your open door and your guide to Canada. Its offices in important cities are ready to supply complete information. Its services take you direct from American centres to everywhere in Canada.

parts of the world became galvanized into action. The scattered sections spontaneously struck a common pose of resentment, as if they were actually controlled by a central directive system. Jews seemed to forget their social pretensions, or their economic advantages and for the nonce became sensitive to a blow in the remote land of Palestine. The Jews in Warsaw lamented. And on the same day the Jews in Cuba, and the Jews in Capetown, and the Jews in New York, and the Jews in Melbourne all were aware of an identical ache. And the voice of protest that emanated from all these places had a common timbre and a common ring. It was the voice of Jacob. On the same day the Jewish peddler on Essex Street, New York, went through emotional experiences identical with those of Lord Melchett. The starving "Luft mensch" of the "Nalevkes" felt and thought in the same terms of Felix Warburg or Lord Reading. Distinctions of caste and class melted away even as did the differences of environment and cultural affiliations.

The unity of the Jewish people in the hour of despair is indeed an amazing phenomenon. Regardless of theoretical professions, all Jews alike seemed to regard a blow at the national idea as a vital affliction. Is there really a central motif, a fundamental harmony in Jewish life, unobserved in ordinary times, which reacts to great national crisis on rare, fateful occasions?

An Affair of Honor

They Need You NOW as Never Before.

Outstretched Hands Must they plead in Vain

CAN you face the pleadings of men, women and little children who with outstretched hands, tell of Hunger, Sickness and Misery such as is seemingly beyond human endurance, and remain unmoved . . . indifferent?

Can you deny your aid to people gaunt from want of food . . . exhausted in the great fight for a mere existence?

Year by year Federation's task has become more difficult. Year by year the demands have become greater. This year the situation is critical — you must help us!

Pause a moment now, as you read this. Decide on the maximum amount you can possibly afford to give. Be ready for the workers when they call — they are giving their time and money — they are straining in a great effort to reach our objective $300,000. Help them by a ready subscription!

Remember the great cause, the "Affair of Honour" which we have built up. We must not fail! Honor alone demands that we must live up to this, our greatest obligation.
